Excerpt: . . . and the plastering on the walls is carried around to the window-frames. There can be no doubt that the interior finish of all school-rooms ought to be as simple as possible, both as regards quality and quantity. There are the same reasons for preserving the utmost cleanliness, and freedom from all forms of details in the finishing and furnishing that will produce or harbor dust and dirt, that exist in hospitals for the sick. In some respects this is Design O. more readily accomplished in a building whose walls are of bricks and terracotta, to which lime mortar, cement, or tiles can be directly applied, than in a wooden building, the interior walls of which can be most conveniently and economically finished with lath and plaster, or with wood sheathing. The former is easily broken, besides being absorbent of dampness and moist exhalations, unless thoroughly painted, and the latter objectionable, on account of the cracks which are sure to appear after the wood has become perfectly seasoned. Wood is also absorbent, and unless very carefully protected by paint or varnish becomes musty with age. For this reason, plastered walls are preferable to common plastering, except where they are exposed to rough usage. Still, it is a mistake to lath and plaster the ceilings of any room, if it can be avoided. Even the PiAv-or iccPVD TLogfv i strongest mortar, applied in what is considered the best manner, has no reliable strength of its own. It...
