Journey from Nelson to the Port Cooper Plains. BY E. J. LEE. Monday, Dec 22nd, 1851. Started from Bedboroughs run about half-past eight, and, after passing over Mouats flat, which is very stony, got safely to Tinlines run. Reached Todds warre about six o'clock, and determined to camp for the night. I was agreeably surprised to find the difficulties of this part of my road so much less than I had been given to expect. A very tolerable bridle path may easily be made, but a dray road would scarcely, I think, be possible. Dec. 23rd. Started at five o'clock, hoping to avoid the sandflies, which were in clouds and most voracious: they were up before me, however, and glad enough I was to start from their neighbourhood. The road, after rising the hills, was very rough, but gradually improved; and after an hour and a halfs travelling I made Boltons warre, where I had a capital breakfast of damper and mutton. Bolton set me on my route as far as the Hodder, and I got on very well until I crossed the river below the junction of the Grey, when, trying to ascend the opposite bank, my mare lost her footing and rolled headlong down, taking two turns before she got to her feet. I thought it was all over with her, but was glad to escape a more serious accident at the expense of my cooking utensils, which were more...
