I deliver to the American public a philosophical system, comprised under the name of Monism and Meliorism two words which have been used by different philosophers, and which, for some time, have indicated, as it were, the direction of the development of philosophic thought. Monism is the ideal which no one hitherto has been able to realize satisfactorily, though many have tried to do so. It has become, therefore, the watch-word of diverse parties, who lacked the solid basis, on which to erect the building of such a conception of the world, as might be well founded in its cornerstone and harmonious in its structure. The cornerstone to be chosen is causality and the only criterion by which any philosophical theory can be tested and verified, is given in its doctrine of ethics. But on both subjects the greatest confusion prevails, both of them being problems, which still wait for a definite solution. And after so many attempts, a new solution, in consonance with modern science, by which the old controversies may be reconciled, is extremely desirable. The novelty of the solution here proposed does not consist in bringing forward new and startling views; quite the contrary! The true philosopher must endeavor to avoid originality as much as possible, and cling with full concentration of mind to impartial investigation. Original ideas often allure and dazzle with a fine brilliancy, but they are treacherous owing to the very subjectivity which renders them so...
